Hooke, Robert Hooke, jonThis invention relates to a method of preparing a diphenylamine compound, and more specifically to a method of preparing a diphenylamine compound from a monomer of a diphenylamine. The diphenylamine compound is one of the thermosetting resins having excellent heat-resistance and is usable in various fields. For example, it has recently been extensively used as a resin raw material for photoresist. Although the use of the diphenylamine compound in other fields are also expected, the development of industrial processes for preparing the diphenylamine compound as a substitute for the conventional aromatic amine raw material (such as tributyltin chloride) is still in progress. At present, the production of the diphenylamine compound is effected by (1) a method of reacting an alkylene polyamine with a phenyl halogen compound, (2) a method of reacting an aromatic halide with an alkali metal salt of an aromatic amine, and (3) a method of reducing a phthalonitrile or a malononitrile. Of these methods, the method of reacting an alkylene polyamine with a phenyl halogen compound is industrially advantageous and is widely used. As the alkylene polyamine, a hydrazine compound is usually used but an organic polyamine is also known. In recent years, it has been proposed to use a radical polymerization initiator instead of the hydrazine compound or the organic polyamine. Thus, there have been reported a method of using, as a polymerization initiator, a thiocarbonyl halide containing, as the substituent, sulfide or sulfoxide, a method of using, as a polymerization initiator, a quinone oxidizing agent, and a method of using, as a polymerization initiator, a sodium thiolate. However, the conventional methods have disadvantages of the need for an
